

Concept Question 5-1: Why do we not simply use pixel values directly as numerical measures of image intensities?

Because the range of pixel values is often very large (and some values may be negative), especially for spectra of non-negative images, for which the value at the origin (the sum of all pixel values) is much larger than other values.